Biographical history: John Penrose Barron (JPB) was born in Morley, west Yorkshire, on 27 April 1934. Educated at Clifton College, Bristol, he went up to Oxford in 1953 as an exhibitioner at Balliol College, where he read Classics. He graduated in 1957 with first-class honours, going on to complete his doctorate in 1961 on the history of Samos to 439 BC. Barron's academic career began when he joined Bedford College, London, as an Assistant Lecturer in Latin. In 1964, he moved to University College London as a Lecturer in Archaeology, becoming Reader in 1967. For twenty years from 1971, he was Professor of Greek at King's College London, having been elected to the Chair at the age of only 37. He was also Director of the Institute of Classical Studies of London University (1984-1991), Pro-Vice-Chancellor for the Arts (1987-1989) and Dean of the Institutes for Advance Study (1989-1991). He also served as the University of London's Public Orator (1978-1981, 1986-1988). His publications include Introduction to Greek Sculpture (1965, revised 1981) and The Silver Coins of Samos (1966). In 1991, he was elected Master of St Peter's College, Oxford, a post he would hold until 2003. His Mastership was characterised by a rise in both the number of female students at the college and its academic performance. Barron also oversaw the development of three off-site halls of residence, as well as an unsuccessful attempt to acquire the nearby site of Oxford Prison, which had closed in 1996. After his retirement in 2003, he chaired a number of educational institutions, such as the Cassel Trust and the committee of Lambeth Palace Library. In 1962, he married Caroline Barron (née Hogarth), who would herself go on to become a leading historian of medieval London and professor of medieval history at Royal Holloway College, and with whom he had two daughters (Catherine and Helen). Prof John Penrose Barron died on 16 August 2008.
